The French and Indian War was a war between Britain and France from 1754-1763. The French and the British were fighting for control of North America.

The French fought with their Indian allies and were more skilled in fighting in the thick forests of North America than the British. There were many battles and eventually the British became experts in fighting in the American wilderness too.

The most important victory was the capture of Quebec by the English on February 10, 1763. The Treaty of Paris was signed and France agreed to surrender to England almost all of its North American territory.

The Colonies were fairly free from British control but things began to change. The British wanted to enforce trade restrictions and make the colonists pay taxes. In 1764, the British passed the Sugar Act. It put a tax on sugar and goods imported from other places. Then, in 1765, the British Parliament passed the Stamp Act. This act required the colonists to purchase stamps from the British for newspapers, almanacs, and many paper goods. The colonists boycotted these stamps. The colonists said this was "taxation without representation". This meant that there was no one from the colonies in the British government helping to make decisions. The colonists decided to do something to stop these unfair laws.

Many of the Colonists thought they should work together to fight the Stamp Act. They formed the Stamp Act Congress in 1765. Benjamin Franklin, one of the leaders, talked about the problems this law caused for the Colonists. They decided to send a declaration to King George III stating the rights the Colonists had as British citizens. The Stamp Act Congress declared the British had no right to tax the Colonists without representation. Since the Colonists boycotted the British goods and imports, the British merchants started to lose money. They wanted King George to repeal the Stamp Act. In March 1766, the Stamp Act was repealed. However, the British passed another act called the Townsend Act to tax other goods such as glass.

The British wanted to keep control of the Colonists so they sent many more soldiers to the Colonies. Soldiers were stationed in cities like Boston. This caused many problems. The Colonists called the soldiers names and the soldiers became angry. Trouble soon started and soldiers began damaging property of the Colonists. Fights broke out betweens the soldiers and the Colonists. On March 5, 1770, a mob angered the British soldiers. The British soldiers fired into the crowd. Three Colonists were killed. Among those killed was Crispus Attucks, a former slave. News of the Boston Massacre spread quickly though the colonies.

In 1773, the British still had a tax on tea. The East India Company had a monopoly on tea because Colonial businessmen who imported their own tea to sell had to pay import taxes, causing the price to be much higher. The East India Company could sell their tea cheaper because it was not taxed as much. This caused the Colonists to become angry, and they would not allow ships carrying British tea to enter their ports. But the governor of Massachusetts ordered the ships to dock. On December 16, 1773, a group of Colonists known as the Sons of Liberty dressed as Native Americans and boarded some of the ships in Boston Harbor. They threw chests of tea into the water. This act of rebellion against the British became known as the Boston Tea Party.

The colonists would not let British ships containing tea dock in their cities and sent them back to England.

The British reacted to the Boston Tea Party by passing strict laws. These laws were to punish the Colonists. The first law blockaded Boston Harbor and closed the port until the Colonists paid for the ruined tea. This was called the Boston Port Bill. The second law, the Massachusetts Government Act, banned the Colonists from making laws and having town meetings. The third act forced the Colonists to give food and shelter to the British soldiers. The Colonists thought these laws were unreasonable and called them the Intolerable Acts. These Intolerable Acts caused the Colonists to become united to preserve their liberties.
